How bad is watching TV for your health?

It has been claimed that watching TV for more than two hours a day increases the risk of raised blood pressure in children.

According to a study, children aged two to ten who spent this much time in front of a TV or computer screen were 30 per cent more likely to have high blood pressure than those who did not. Lack of physical activity increased the risk even more, by 50 per cent, scientists found.

Research has also suggested that each hour spent watching TV daily increases the chance of developing diabetes by 3.4 per cent in high-risk individuals.

Researchers have also claimed that watching too much TV is as dangerous as smoking or being overweight, and that this should be seen as a “public health problem”.

Experts from the University of Queensland, Australia, write: “TV viewing time may have adverse health consequences that rival those of lack of physical activity, obesity and smoking; every single hour of TV viewed may shorten life by as much as 22 minutes.”

Referring to Australian and American guidelines that suggest children should spend no more than two hours a day in front of a screen, the academics conclude: “With further corroborative evidence, a public health case could be made that adults also need to limit the time spent watching TV.”
