Turkish Women Quit Jobs to Raise Children

In Ankara (Turkey), one million women have renounced to their jobs over the period from 2010-2015 as a result of the duties bound to children care. According to the Turkish Enterprise and Business Confederation (TURKONFED) not only have they quit their jobs but a lot of them have done it upon the request of their husband.

The chairman of the business group, Targan Kadoglu, states that a new solution in the Turkish labour system must be formulized to create more space for women to keep continuing their professional work life and carry out their caretaking responsibilities in their private life. He defends that social security systems financing children, the disabled, the elderly people’s care and care insurance must be effectively used to improve the situation. Having insufficient numbers of kindergartens, high costs and poor quality of services create extra burdens on mothers. On the contrary, birth loans, social insurance premiums, and employment incentives encourage women to return to their careers after giving birth, playing an important role in increasing female employment rates.
