The "wasteful" fashion industry

Clothes must be designed differently, worn for longer and recycled as much as possible to stop the global fashion industry consuming a quarter of the world's annual carbon budget by 2050.

Fashion designer Stella McCartney recently condemned her industry as "incredibly wasteful and harmful to the environment", joining forces with round-the-world and environmental campaigner Dame Ellen MacArthur´s to call for a systemic change to the way clothing is produced and used. She claims that the scale of the waste is enormous, and that the throwaway nature of fashion has created a business which creates greenhouse emissions of 1.2 tonnes a year – larger than that of international flights and shipping combined.

MacArthur has gained the support of industry leaders including the C&A Foundation, H&M, and Nike with a report which calls for a circular textile economy to make fashion more sustainable. She calls for four actions to be taken: to phase out substances of microfiber release, increase clothing utilization, to radically improve recycling, and to move to renewable materials.

Figures in the report reveal the throwaway nature of today's fashion industry, which is based on a faster turnaround model, with more new collections released per year, at lower prices. Globally, customers throw away clothes that they could continue to wear, admitting that they own more clothes than they need.

Clothing reutilization has decreased by 70% over the last 15 years, so MacArthur is trying to provide solutions for an industry which is hugely wasteful and polluting, including oil to produce synthetic fibres, fertilisers to grow cotton, and chemicals to produce, dye, and finish fibres and textiles.
